Chicago Bears Stadium Update

The Chicago Bears have provided an update on ongoing discussions surrounding a potential new stadium and the future home of the franchise. The organization has been actively engaged with leaders from both Mike Braun, the Governor of Indiana, and lawmakers in Illinois to decide the best long-term venue for the team and its fans.

Last week, the team announced significant progress in Indiana, where the governor signed Senate Bill 27 into law, establishing a formal framework for building a new stadium in Hammond, Indiana, near the Illinois border. This legislation marks the most tangible step forward in Bears stadium planning so far, creating a pathway for potential construction and future partnership outside the city of Chicago.

At the same time, committees within the Illinois House of Representatives have approved legislation aimed at generating incentives for a Bears stadium in Arlington Heights, which allows local municipalities to negotiate property taxes to support major development. While not yet final, this legislation represents an important development in Illinois' efforts to keep the franchise in the state.

"We are deeply appreciative of the engagement we've seen from leaders in both Indiana and Illinois. Our priority remains finding a solution that supports our fans, players, and the long-term success of the Bears organization," said a Bears spokesperson. Additionally, the Bears emphasize that any stadium development would extend beyond football, and serve as a destination for concerts, collegiate sporting events, community programs, and economic development initiatives. The organization reiterated its commitment to transparency throughout the process and pledged continued communication with fans and local partners.

The Bears will continue to evaluate both proposals in the coming weeks and work closely with community leaders, stakeholders, and season ticket holders as part of a comprehensive evaluation process. A final decision timeline has not yet been announced, but team officials have said that discussions remain active and that further updates will be provided as negotiations progress in both states.
